GAME SETUP

Using as few or as many timbers as you'd like, write a dare on one side and an intriguing personal question on the other.

Build the starting tower on a flat, stable surface. Start by placing three timbers evenly alongside one another. Place another three timbers on top of those, at a 90-degree angle to the first level, forming an even, solid second level (Figure 1). Continue stacking timbers in sets of three, alternating the direction of each level, until all timbers have been stacked into a 24-story tower.

GAME PLAY

Players take turns removing timbers, one at a time, from the lower levels of the tower and using them to build a new top level. Using one hand only, the first player carefully removes one timber from anywhere below the top level by either sliding or tapping it out of position.

If the player pulls a truth-or-dare timber, they have their choice of sides. If they can't/won't complete the dare or answer the question, they must pull another timber. If that one is also a truth-or-dare, they must complete one of the sides or pull again. This continues until a player either completes a dare, answers a question, or pulls a non-truth-or-dare timber and successfully adds it to the top.

When a timber is added to the top—still using only one hand!—it should be placed at a 90 degree angle to the timbers on the level below it. Place no more than three timbers on each level and complete each three-timber level before starting to build the next.

Players continue taking turns as described above until one player causes the tower to topple. The last player to stack a timber on top without knocking over the tower wins the game.

An additional rule option is to issue a "master dare" to the player who topples the tower.
